Naa Djama Attoh-Okine is dedicated to promoting health equity, human rights, and social justice for marginalized communities. She began volunteering as a rape crisis and domestic violence advocate with Crime Victims Treatment Center in 2017. In this position, she provides crisis counseling, emotional support, and advocacy to survivors at several NYC-based hospitals. She earned a BA and MPH from New York University, where she was a Martin Luther King Jr. Scholar and designed an undergraduate concentration around the intersection of “Health, History, and Human Rights in a Sub-Saharan African Context”. Over the past several years, she has collaborated with harm reduction centers, safe houses, and public policy organizations. Currently, she is researching psychosocial correlates of intimate partner violence in college students, sex workers, and perinatally HIV-infected young adults. She is also developing an investigative podcast about sexual violence and institutional cover-ups in sports.

Jessica Altagracia Woolford is a mom, a caregiver, a mutual aid organizer, and proud Dominicana. She's worked in local and national Democratic politics and government for nearly a decade including at the 2016 Democratic Convention, the UFCW International, the de Blasio administration, New York Immigration Coalition, and Senator Kirsten Gillibrand's office. And she's a former rank-and-file CWA member. Her grandma taught her that care should never be conditional. And that with faith, anything is possible.

At the height of the pandemic, Woolford started Kingsbridge Unidos: a volunteer-run, mutual aid effort to deliver over 30,000 pounds of fresh produce, in addition to thousands of masks, and valuable bilingual information about COVID-19 and more, to families in Kingsbridge. What started as a door-to-door delivery program at her grandma's building, has grown to include and prioritize families experiencing homelessness through creative, uplifting and joyful programming.

Woolford believes we have the power to shape a vibrant world where every kid who lives here has a chance to know joy, abundance, and possibility. For every elder to know compassion, stability and dignity. And for every New Yorker to get a shot at living out their dreams without ever having to leave home.
